Annie Drury releases 'Some Day' EP on 14th April 2014, through Cuckoo Records.

Annie Drury's voice tells a million stories. Born into a musical family of professional Irish folk musicians dating back to the 1940's, she took to the stage when she was just 11 years old near her hometown, at Haworth Festival in Yorkshire. Now at 21 years of age her unique style of singing and playing has developed to make Annie Drury one of the most exciting new female artists in the UK.

Drury is inspired by classic female artists such as Joni Mitchell (who her father introduced her to when she was younger) and Carol King, and her youthful, sensitive voice has a hint of both her idols. She is a modern day lyricist; bright, observant and playful, who is already being described as a female Jeff Buckley.

Annie's songs are tales of her life, featuring a cast of colourful characters and poignant events that she delivers with witty prose and a boundless imagination. On this EP "The man and his god awful wife" in 'Some Day' and the couple who can't dance in 'One Step' have leading roles, as frustration, romance and escapism take hold in these beautifully crafted songs.

'Some Day' is the first song on the 4 track EP is a quirky up-beat alt-pop hit, a tale from when Annie was working in a pub, written as a way to retaliate against rude comments, a declaration to "make you better versions of the miserable men that you are."
