All the way from San Francisco de Asis Xonacatlán, Metepec & San Bartolome Tlaltelulco, State of Mexico, come the creators of “synthcumbia” and “municipal electronica”.

Sonido San Francisco is a mexican band with colombian roots that mixes folkloric, tropical, regional and popular styles with electronic music, rock, funk and other contemporary genres.

The language created by the mexiquense quartet is assembled as a digital handicraft programmed by hypermodern farmers with access to bandwidth internet, between the memories of life in Colombia, USA and Mexico City and the journey leading to Xona, where most of their songs are created combining old, traditional, vernacular music, influenced by the inherited vinyl collections of their grandparents; with electronic tools, analogue synthesizers, computers, organic sounds and typical instruments such as guacharaca, accordion and colombian gaita.

Music

This delivery to new tropical music synthesizes the many and diverse influences of SSF, where electronic music, cumbia and other latin rythms thrive, connect and communicate like in a sunday tianguis (indigenous street market), where smells mix and it's impossible to tell the difference between fruit, mezcalito (sweet maguey) and fresh fish.

In 2014 they released the album "Sentimiento Electrónico" (Electronic Feeling), recorded and produced by Gerry Rosado in the studios of Intolerancia Records, and presented it officially on march 27 at Vive Latino Festival, along with hit video single "Vacilela", in which they combine high energy with mexican corrido. That was their third time in a row playing Vive Latino (2012, 2013 & 2014).

Also in 2014, Ponk Records (Chile/USA) edits "Sin Mucho Sentido" (Without Much Sense), a tribute to Talking Heads, in which Sonido San Francisco contributes with a new version of the classic hit "Burning Down the House".

That same year the flexidisc single "Toluca Tropikal" comes out in collaboration with Marvin magazine, La Roma Records & Doritos.

In 2012 the band's #1 hit "El Género Romántico" appears in "Cañonazo Electrocumbiero" released by EMI.

2010, Sonido San Francisco records and produces the EP "Independencia Sessions" that became the only demo ever nominated to the IMAS awards for best folklore/popular album.

Sonido San Francisco envoys of synthcumbia

Band fuses folkloric rhythms and synthesizer

By Henry Flores

Without a job and in the midst of a personal crisis, musician Sebastian Cardenas packed his belongings and fled Mexico City for his hometown of Austin, Texas. There he reunited with childhood friends with whom he had played in his first band, Tropicana. Cardenas had been away for 15 years, but he found himself in a new city with old friends and a new sound.

There he reunited with childhood friends with whom he had played in his first band, Tropicana. Cardenas had been away for 15 years, but he found himself in a new city with old friends and a new sound.

When I was about 20, I moved to Austin, Texas. I was looking for a new challenge. I was looking for a new sound. I was looking for a new way to express myself. I was looking for a new way to connect with the world around me. I was looking for a new way to live. I was looking for a new way to love. I was looking for a new way to be.

Mexico's Sonido San Francisco Party in Magic Rickshaw

The blogs are raving about Sonido San Francisco's quirky Mexican take on cumbia, and I have to agree. Their loopy yet infectious electro cumbia track "El Género Romántico" could get me in the mood to go out on even the gloomiest night, and the video for it could help me decide what to wear.

They start through a corridor with a band of travelers, before materializing an enchanted rickshaw and riding off into the phantoms. At 1:30 they're in a house they call "Bata" — and that they bring their accordion and their synthesizers when they do.

They're in the back, of course. They're wearing on their job too. It's just a rickshaw.

But some people might be wondering why a Mexican band is playing cumbia. Well, it's because they love it. But also because Sonido San Francisco founder Sebastian Castaneda is Colombian.

Don't let things be thinking to much about the blogs. Just watch this.

"Tú eres sonidero, sonidero total" mira la canción de Sonido San Francisco con la que los dimos a conocer en el programa 800. Originarios de Xonacatlán, Estado de México, hacen una cumbia sudorosa y rasposa gracias a sus influencias de cumbia mexicana y colombiana.

"Bandas to Watch out for: Sonido San Francisco - "Tú eres sonidero, sonidero total" prays Sonido San Francisco's song with which we aired them in show #80. Originally from Xonacatlan, State of Mexico, they make a sweaty, grindy cumbia thanks to their mexican/colombian influence. Drums, bass, percussion, vocoder and synthesizers embellished with a powerful deep voice fire up the dancefloor, make the most diverse crowd dance and steal a smile to those who listen."

“VIDEO: SONIDO SAN FRANCISCO - "EL GÉNERO ROMÁNTICO" - We've finally caught up to the growing hype of Sonido San Francisco's "El Género Romántico" (great title), an infectious song that's starting to become a regular on any DJ hipster set around us. Behind all the hype, there's a truly memorable synthesized cumbia merging Colombia's pop music & aesthetics, with Mexico's idiosyncratic humor at a jam-packed 'populachero' degree. Our friends at Panamerika have been buzzing the tune as a "sabroso sanchocho sonoro", and there are no better words to describe it.” (http://www.clubfonograma.com/2010/10/video-sonido-san-francisco-el-genero.html)
